The implicit request here is that we have a site that where you create your own questions, and then answer them, but there are few people on the network doing this. It's the questions that other people don't want to answer. The thing is we don't want to create this site like we did for language questions, since that's not good. There are many ways we can do this. One that comes to mind is a beta site where you answer your own questions: "A site where people answer their own questions", but there's no meta for this kind of site and I don't want to make the same mistake we did for language. Should we try to make this type of site? A: I have been doing it in the past, on my own sites. It isn't my most active activity, though. I have not suggested this to SE, and I don't know if it would fly. But I am all for whatever works. A: I think this would be a valuable addition to the network, but I think we would need to secure it in some way before going through the process of creating a site. There would need to be some mechanism in place to prevent gaming (particularly for those who aren't "creators"), but I think the core of our Q&A format would be what keeps it from becoming a mere popularity contest. A: A site where you create

I'm looking for a way to do this in C#. Does anyone know if this is possible? I have the following signature: public void UpdateFoo(Func condition, Action action) Thanks A: There's no way to do that directly, but you can create a new class and implement your method by then using Activator.CreateInstance() to construct and pass the Func and Action objects. Note that you cannot use Delegate or Action if the method you are calling is a generic one, such as your UpdateFoo, because the Activator.CreateInstance() method can only create instances of classes that have an appropriate constructor. You can go further and use some reflection to change the Func to a delegate with a parameter of type object that will work for the method you want to call, but you'll need to know what signature the method's Func parameter is going to take. You could
