Monday, November 05, 2010 Victory Day from the Red Army Today is Victory Day in Russia, and today the ice on Siberia's Lake Baikal, nearly a thousand miles inland from here, was almost a foot thick - or maybe it was just frozen over. We were reminded of this as hundreds of people in cities as far away as Siberia, Russia's frigid northwest, and as close as Vladivostok, Russia's southeastern tip, drove through the icy streets to remember. But I am back now, though I do hope to be back for tomorrow's parade. Fortunately, the temperature is here. The weather might have been more to the liking of those from the Red Army on all fronts in the region during their often epic battles with Nazi Germany, but this year has been comparatively mild in this part of Russia. We will have been here just a month when the flowers break out and the bulbs go to seed. It is, as that northern statue of Lenin puts it, 'a long, hard and bloody war.' Russia might not hold a candle to many of the world's nations in terms of number of lives lost or more years of war, but its history since the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 is a tale of heroism, death and perseverance. Even the more recent conflict with Georgia has gone down in Russian history as a war of liberation, and the boundary issue, now in a tentative peace treaty, is Russia's 'traditional' boundary, with no right of return for the Tblisi secessionists. The rout of Nazi Germany on the Eastern Front was a great victory for Stalin's Russia. It was the culmination of decades of
