There are a number of file formats that are used to store/display images, for example: PNG is used for raster images or animations. PTX is used for animated text. PNG is also used to store images with transparency where PTX is not appropriate. XPM is used for bitmap raster images. However, I often work with images that contain (lots of) small, text-like areas in which I can make a lot of improvements by doing glyph recognition and replacing the glyphs with a line drawing. I often need to do this for a large number of small images. However, I'm not sure whether to work in a vector format (like PDF) or working on the actual image in the PNG format with Photoshop.
