We've known for a long time that our five senses—sight, hearing, smell, taste, and touch—are at the epicenter of how we interact with each other. We are not alone, and we don't always interact with people we know; we also interact with the objects that surround us. But how deep is our understanding of how we interact with other people? In their book Psychology of Interpersonal Communication (Psychology of Interpersonal Communication), E. Aronson and L. Davidson, using the theory of social exchange (social psychology of interaction), argue that we know very little about interpersonal communication.
