A: Sorting out the 32 bit vs 64 bit and the 32bit vs 64 bit confusion is fairly straight forward. The main thing to know is that Windows is built to be compatible with Intel and AMD hardware and can run on 32 bit or 64 bit hardware. As far as the components, the main ones are the processor, memory, and storage. So a reasonable rule of thumb is anything with an Intel chip will be 32bit, and anything with an AMD chip will be 64bit. If it has a AMD chip and 64 bit Windows, then it's 64bit. For example, an Intel i3 cpu with a 64 bit Windows installation will be 64bit. A 64 bit AMD system would be 64bit and likely better than a 32 bit system in most cases. Intel will only make a 32 bit processor for future systems with a 32 bit OS. AMD will continue making 32 bit processors. There will be no 64 bit Intel processors in the future. 32 bit OS systems also have the option of using PAE (Physical Address Extension) technology if they want to. This will tell the system that the total amount of memory is 4gb instead of 2^{32} , and will increase the maximum addressable memory for each process. This will only work on 64 bit Windows. It is important to not confuse the 32 bit OS with the 32 bit hardware. Windows is not limited to 32 bit software and can run 64 bit software. What they do means 2^{32} (4GB) in a 32 bit OS and 2^{64} (2^{32} times 2^{32}) (8GB) in a 64 bit OS. This means that a 32 bit system will not be limited to that 4GB memory, but it will have the option of using that extra memory. So say you want to use 8gb of RAM on a 64 bit OS, you need to use a 64 bit processor. AMD CPUs can support 4gb of memory, while Intel CPUs only support 2gb of RAM. Your other option, if you have sufficient storage, is to install a 32 bit Windows system on the 64 bit machine and then run a 32 bit program on the 64 bit system to use all that memory. I hope this helps.
