But sometimes looking at the past can be a revelation, as we've learned on today's randomly selected Retro Gamer Classic, Dead Space. Stick your head inside the DeLorean and travel to a time before the "triggers" were in the game. Take a trip to Old Earth, before the New York wasteland and the floating corpse cities of the Necromorph monster. Just what are Old Earth and the Old Way? Check out our retro video to find out. Myōjō-juku was the 26th of the sixty-nine stations of the Tōkaidō. It is located in what is now the city of Takizawa, in the western part of Gifu Prefecture, Japan. It was the southernmost of the post stations on the Tokaido. It was also a major stopover for travelers as the route through Gifu was known as the Takano Route. History Myōjō-juku was the first post station of Takizawa, and was named in 1614, after the Shingon Buddhist temple of Myōjō-ji. With the construction of Myōjō-ji, the area became known for its cherry trees, and the post station was named for the Japanese cherry tree, Myōjo. At the beginning of the Edo period, Myōjō-juku was an active town, with 75 households. Enrikyō of Ogyūden records that 10,637 people passed through Myōjō-juku in 1614, and 10,116 people in 1615. Myōjō-ji temple is located at Myōjō-juku. It is designated as one of chigen meguri sites. The post station was in the jurisdiction of Takatoshi Magistrate of Gifu Domain until 1871, when Gif
