This is where things start to become interesting. According to the latest report by Mimecast, it is estimated that today about 78% of people use webmail services to send, receive, and archive their email messages. This is quite a jump since less than half of people used webmail back in 2006. As per the research, webmail users are willing to spend more time and have their messages checked later than standard mailbox users. This behavior adds up to the fact that people now have a higher sensitivity to the emails they read. As a result, they are more responsive to your messages, and they can easily shift the balance from "ignore me" to "take me seriously". In fact, a massive 67% of respondents felt that they would rather leave a message on a phone than on a webmail service. Overall, webmail users are more familiar with the benefits of privacy, and they also value the control they have over their privacy options and visibility. This is one reason why they have to be more sensitive to their email correspondence, and they are more likely to start viewing it as their "mailbox". While the recent report shows how the use of webmail is growing at an amazing rate, there are reasons why people are still hesitant to use the service. One of the major concerns from webmail users is the risk of theft, especially when it comes to sensitive messages or financial information. As a result, this pushes them to only use these services for personal accounts, and they avoid downloading client software. A survey conducted by the European Commission revealed that the major reasons for webmail users to choose their default options are: convenience (63%), privacy 09e8f5149f
