The fight for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination is well underway. Right now it's an all-or-nothing race between Hillary Clinton and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont. But there are plenty of other contenders too: Nomiki Konst (a former Guantanamo prison guard); Elizabeth Warren (a former Harvard Law School professor); Martin O'Malley (a former governor of Maryland); Jim Webb (a former U.S. senator); And just last week, Lincoln Chaffee, a former governor of Rhode Island, announced he was running. Among the candidates, only Clinton and Sanders can win the nomination. And it could take all the way to the July convention in Philadelphia. Most commentators agree that the ultimate prize is not the presidency, but the party's nomination for next year's presidential election. Most prefer Clinton, as she has the reputation as a political veteran, and she could do a lot to pad President Obama's record in the next election. But Sanders has the most momentum right now. In recent months, he has won 10 of the past 11 state contests. He captured about 30 percent of the vote against Clinton in the Wisconsin primary on Thursday. And he has a compelling story to tell. His supporters are passionate, and the crowds that pack his events — and those that attend Clinton's — are large, raucous and enthusiastic. Clinton's campaign is strong, but in many ways, it is a defensive operation. She has attacked Sanders, but her attacks have only served to reinforce his main message. Sanders has stumbled, but often he seems
