You will be entertained from the very first level to the last. Do you have what it takes to collect all the balls? Go for it. In another life, I was a theoretical physicist at CERN. I left for other things a long time ago, but I continue to follow the literature on supersymmetry and quantum gravity. The discussion of monojets, published as a comment, and which I shared on my blog, is just one example of the state of the art. The recent experimental developments on the LHC and other accelerators are very exciting. Also, the discovery of the Higgs boson was an astounding achievement, and may possibly herald in a new era of quantum field theory. I can imagine that a lot of theoretical physicists, including some of the leading members of the community, who were, like myself, completely uninterested in the Higgs sector, would have the same reaction that I had: "That's amazing, but I'm not going to change my life for it". This blog post is rather speculative. The main point is that I believe we may be entering a new era where the standard model and general relativity may be disentangled, and supergravity or string theory could provide a coherent picture. This is based on some promising developments: the discovery of the Higgs bos
