Keep up the great work, you are providing a great resource on the Internet here!1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates generally to saw teeth for use in meat saws and more particularly to a meat saw tooth having a sharp tooth portion and a bifurcated support portion. 2. Discussion of the Prior Art A typical meat saw tooth is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,640,608 which is issued on Feb. 3, 1987 to Hammond. The typical meat saw tooth includes a blade supporting portion which is attached to a base portion. The blade supporting portion has a plurality of teeth and a terminating end. The blade supporting portion extends from the terminating end and tapers inwardly in the direction of the base. The base portion has a connecting portion which is the terminating end of the blade supporting portion and the blade supporting portion. The connecting portion extends at an obtuse angle relative to the base portion. The typical meat saw tooth further includes a centrally located projection extending from the blade supporting portion. The projection is a structural feature which is for transferring power from the base portion to the blade supporting portion. The connecting portion of the typical meat saw tooth is an attachment device or flange welded to the blade supporting portion. The typical meat saw tooth is formed of cast iron and the flange is formed of rolled steel. An improvement to the typical meat saw tooth is disclosed in U.S. Pat. No. 5,657,591 which issued on Aug. 19, 1997 to Hammond. There has long been a need in the art for a meat saw tooth which can be manufactured to improve manufacturing efficiency and reduce materials costs. It would be particularly advantageous to provide a meat saw tooth having a new structural configuration which could be fabricated to improve manufacturing efficiency.DE 202 15 976 T5 discloses a device for the transverse insertion of a support means having a relatively large diameter into a pocket of a core pipe having a small diameter and,
