If you wish to generate a CHM file from your Aml Pages document, Aml2CHM is the perfect solution. It offers a very simple one-window interface, which offers very little customization. This, however, doesn't mean that the program will not be of any use. It will provide you with an easy solution for generating help files, no matter what you are using as the Aml Pages editor. As simple as it can get: Aml2CHM plug-in does exactly what it is advertised to do. Easy one-window interface, no customization options, no bells and whistles, minimal features, etc. What it does not do is save as (another) CHM file but rather as a WinHelp file. I still had to keep the.hlp file around (for WinHelp format) but that's about it. Pros: Aml2CHM is dead simple and that's its main draw. It has a single window interface that is easy to navigate and no longer requires that you change your settings every time you launch the plug-in. Cons: The only thing that Aml2CHM lacks is a true CHM document file. Rather than creating a help file, Aml2CHM creates a WinHelp document (the file format for WinHelp documents is a MSHelp 2.0 file). There is no option to change this, although the.hlp file will open just fine. You could, of course, use a file converter (or a VBScript) to convert the file into the CHM format, but it's a chore and I've never wanted to do that. I have a blog at that was created from scratch. The blog software is called WordPress and its free. I just wanted a place to post some of my writings that I would need to access easily. So I signed up for a free blog at Blogger and posted the blog and a few other blogs that I would need to access. A little while later I signed up for an account at MySpace and put the blog there. A few months later I signed up for a free account at TypePad and started posting the same blog there. A few days ago I signed up for a free account at Live Journal and have been posting there as well. So why was I needing to sign up for all these free accounts?
