In a government report being circulated today, the government is expected to propose that copyright holders could force online services to copy content from one user to another or to force a website to delete infringing material. The proposal would apply to both software and content providers such as ISPs, software authors, and content creators. The government is considering establishing a new Copyright, Design and Patents Bill to be presented to Parliament. The government is considering the following options, as well as others. These options will be carefully debated and considered for inclusion in the new legislation, which will replace the law governing the Internet in the UK: Options for copyright holders: compulsory removal of infringing material from services Option for copyright holders: temporary or permanent blocking of services in order to suspend or prevent infringement; Option for copyright holders: compulsory removal of infringing content from services; Option for copyright holders: mandatory inclusion of 'notice and take down' mechanisms in products or services; Option for copyright holders: compulsory inclusion of 'notice and take down' mechanisms in products or services; Option for copyright holders: establishing a new licensing scheme; and Option for copyright holders: preserving the existing laws regarding copyright. This news came as Digital Economy Minister Ed Vaizey presented a BBC survey this week, which questioned 1,000 Britons about the amount of media in their lives and what they think about using paid online media. The survey found that 56 percent of people felt it 570a42141b
