The goal of this proposal is to study how CPEB functions in retinal development and function. The long-term goal of this project is to provide better insight into the cause of human congenital blindness and cataracts. Conditional alleles have become a powerful tool to study gene function in the mammalian retina. Cre recombinase, which is activated by tissue specific promoters, is one of the most commonly used conditional alleles. In this study, we aim to use the Cre/loxP recombination system to study whether CPEB plays a role in retinal cell specification, differentiation and function. The central hypothesis of this proposal is that CPEB regulates retinal cell fate and function. The following specific aims will be addressed: 1) Determine the spatial expression pattern of the CPEB gene during embryonic and postnatal development of the retina. 2) Generate a CPEB conditional knockout mouse and determine the effect of CPEB deletion in embryonic and postnatal development of the retina and 3) Determine the effect of CPEB on retinal function. The study will be done in the postnatal CPEB mouse model in which CPEB is genetically deleted from the retina during the first 2 weeks of life. We will perform a detailed anatomical analysis and perform electrophysiological measurements. Ultimately, this project will provide a better understanding of the role of CPEB in regulating retinal cell fate and function and will identify new genes involved in the development and function of the mammalian retina. PUBLIC HEALTH RELEVANCE: Relevance to Public Health Blindness and congenital cataracts are common congenital malformations caused by developmental
