At work When you have a large job like I do, you hire an in-house graphic designer to do the work for you. The designer designs all the logos, brochures, advertising campaigns, and other documents needed by the business. If you're lucky, you'll get a freelancer graphic designer on your project, but you might have to find one yourself. He may be able to create the logo for you from scratch or he may be able to work around the existing logo and color scheme you have. He can also change the overall look and feel of your corporate documents and branding. This is a job where Photoshop can be used to great effect. For example, let's say you decide you want to change the current brochure/flyer that you currently have in order to better reflect the company's new direction. You can Photoshop the new design and then print and hand deliver the finished product to the printers to get copies of the new brochure printed. If you don't know any graphic designers, you can ask your local Internet café for help or ask around your company. Someone must know a good one who can work with you. A lot of companies have a virtual design department. Designing is the sort of creative task that requires a lot of practice and experience. If you have an interest in graphic design and want to learn, but aren't able to get a big job in-house, it may be worth your time and effort to learn how to do a little bit of graphic design yourself. Of course, graphic design is much more than Photoshop. If you want to know more, you can hire a graphic designer to help you

Tournier's syndrome: an old story with a new twist. Tournier's syndrome was first described in 1863 by a French surgeon named Jacques François Tournier. A patient with cholera had necrosis of skin, subcutaneous tissue, and the left testicle and scrotum. We report a case of Tournier's syndrome and discuss various aspects of the condition. The patient had infection with bacillus cereus from a frozen frozen beef product which he had eaten. A focal gangrenous change of skin and subcutaneous tissue of left thigh and left testicle and scrotum, with extensive necrosis and atrophy of left testicle, was seen on physical examination. Magnetic resonance imaging showed absence of the left testicle. Exploratory orchiectomy was performed. Diffuse infection of left spermatic cord and testicle was observed, with extensive necrosis and the seminiferous tubules were fragmented. Polymicrobial sepsis with bacillus cereus was identified. The necrotic areas were drained and the skin was closed. The dead tissue was removed. The patient was treated with antibiotics and hematinics. A repeat magnetic resonance imaging study after 6 weeks of antibiotics showed a completely healed area of skin and subcutaneous tissue. In conclusion, Tournier's syndrome is a well known clinical entity, but this is the first reported case of sepsis in a young person as a result of using beef as a ready meal. The patient was successfully treated by an extensive debridement, adequate antibiotics, and adequate nutritional support.
