What's new in Dogot Games:

is now available. I'm talking about the picture here. It's not a card board cut-out, it's a digital terrain map. I made it a couple days ago for a game I'm currently planning. Removing the Tru-Tracs Bridge from the Rhine Crossing lets the map fit a smaller (5x5) game box. That's just one of the nice things that the box does. You can download a sample, or you can grab it here. Here are some thoughts on the scenarios in this pack. If you have played this area in a 4x4 game, you will note quite a few changes. If you're a 4x4 aficionado, it should be worth playing the package twice; once using the original playing board, and then again with the revised one. I will probably do that at some point here and there, because a great game is six times better if you can interpret your own results.

NEC Scenario Details: The scenario takes place in general neighborhood area, north of the NE corridor from Philadelphia to New York City. If you zoom in, you'll see most buildings are about 200-500 feet long, from one side to the other. There are state buildings, borough government buildings and quarter sized (20-100 feet long) buildings scattered around. The corridors include river crossings, locks, and other mid-level crossings. Overall, I like how it turned out. I've incorporated some improvements I've learned with this scenario in the past. I always seem to forget things that I know well and it adds a considerable amount of stress to gameplay. I also made changes to the smoke that I'd learned on the FunSet scenarios. In this scenario, I think smoke makes the player's position hard to discern very quickly and forces a reevaluation of initiative. I've tried the games I've played so far without smoke, and it's still an issue. I'm not sure if there's a perfect configuration, and this is how I've found it. I may or may not retry without smoke in the future, but I don't want to trash talk it too much, since I don't want the scenarios to feel gimmicky. Overall, the game results have been improved with the changes I made. The columns on the western and eastern sides of the board were just made by accident. The map was designed to be a rectangle and I couldn't remember how the color flow in the corners stopped

The ratatatatatatatata went on and on...and on. The sun was in the west and the sound of shuffling footfalls came from all sides. Suddenly, a horde of unsavoury creatures rushed in on the poor father from every possible angle. But he was no ordinary man, no average man... How can I put it? One look at him was enough. He wielded a large staff, no, it was a club, and he was the last man I would have thought would be confronted by such a monstrosity. But here he stood, wielding his weapon and looking down upon his enemies in a way that clearly said he was a good man at heart. The chippy. He picked it up. The chippy was looking at him, urging him on. There was no doubt: he was in a tough spot. The good doctor seemed to have gotten tired. He set the heavy thing on the ground and walked toward us. All of a sudden, the chippy made a run for it. He swung his club, and the chippy groaned on the ground. The horrible pile of flesh and fur next to him made a run for it, too. It tried to reach for some direction, but there were no clear options. All paths led right to where the chippy lay, which was in its own way death. The pile slowly began to move toward the doctor. I didn't see how it got there, I guess it was the son. The thought came to me: if the doctor hadn't taken
