Inhaler devices typically comprise a device body and a medicinal agent delivery cartridge, which is insertable into the device body. The device body is the component of the inhaler device that is located in the device mouthpiece, while the cartridge comprises a base and a separate (typically cylindrical) reservoir for storing the medicinal agent. In order to administer a dose of the medicinal agent, the cartridge is typically inserted into the device body, so that the base engages a piercing member of the device body. In the conventional state of the art, the reservoir is pressed against the piercing member so as to allow the medicinal agent to be drawn out through the piercing member by means of the user inhalation. The drug can be contained within the cartridge in many different forms, depending on the type of drug to be administered, and how the drug is to be administered to the user. For example, powdered drug may be contained within the cartridge, and delivered to the patient in the form of a dry powder aerosol, or drug may be in the form of a gel, water solution, or the like. Another type of the drug are the so-called "smart" drugs, a type of drug that, unlike the regular dry powdered drugs, is dissolved or suspended in a solvent, and that is dissolved or suspended using at least one smart drug material (disclosure document U.S. Pat. No. 6,025,136). This type of drug may be prepared as a slurry, an emulsion, a solution, or the like. The problem that arises in the prior art when using smart drug cartridges is that, despite the fact that the reservoir is pressed against the piercing member, the drug does not flow out of the reservoir through the piercing member upon a user's inhalation. The reason for that is that the layer of drug contained in the reservoir is typically thin, and it does not have the thickness to push against the piercing member. As
