Website: Twitter: Facebook: By the end of 2011, I was ready to give up on games. I was tired of full games, paid in advance, that I could only play a tiny fraction of due to piracy. I was tired of the $60+ barrier to entry for many games, even indies. I was tired of the stigma against PC games in general. However, after the release of The Incredible Adventures of Van Helsing, that all changed for good. Van Helsing is an episodic game, which means that some of the seasons will add more game elements to the story, adding more elements of the game, and delivering the plot and characters to a larger game audience. Besides the increased game elements, this has allowed more players to check out the game, which I believe is a good thing. The amount of art and media that went into The Incredible Adventures of Van Helsing was staggering, but worth it in the end. Van Helsing is a very funny, very dramatic, and very interesting video game. There is a lot to pick at, as there are far more hidden aspects to the story than what is on the surface, the game and all of the DLCs come in many shapes and sizes. What's new:

Codename: Mallow is an Australian war film, set during the battle of Ioribaiwa in 1943. The screenplay was written by Robert Connolly and John Matthias. The main roles include an Australian tank commander under a false British Royal Military Police (RMP) name and three US servicemen from various regiments stationed at Ioribaiwa during the battle. Concurrently during the battle, an Australian infantry squad drives from the airstrip at Ioribaiwa to the Japanese camp they are relieving, and then occupy a new camp of the Japanese defenders, where they continue their operation. The film was made for the Australian Department of National Development. Production took place in Queensland. Shooting began in December 1996. The film was shot using 35mm and Super 8 film stock, and was edited on the Avid video editing system. The soundtrack was scored by Russell Smith. Publicity The Australian government worked closely with distributors to get the film finished. The government was putting a lot of money into the film, which was intended to be released in the mid-2000s. It was publicised in cinemas and through the mail, however the film had limited public release. The major issue was that the film was certified "not suitable for children". Although the tag-line of the film was "Respite From The War" the scriptwriters had consciously avoided references to war and the conflict which was going on at the time. Colourist Allan Burdge was responsible for colour research for the film and was involved in selecting the correct timings of the colour mix for the various scenes. The cinematographer for the film was Damian Garrod. A 16mm film print was found in the National Archives in the UK which is believed to be an unfinished version of the film. Plot summary The film is based upon events during the battle of Ioribaiwa, in October 1943, when the small Australian garrison on the Ioribaiwa airstrip was surrounded by the Japanese army. The Australian infantry force arrives at the airstrip to relieve the unit, which is under attack by enemy forces. The battle is almost over by the time the aircraft arrives at Ioribaiwa, but it is not there to take off. Instead it lands on the airstrip and most of the passengers jump off. The film then switches to a contemporary
