The application allows users to avoid complicated coding and provides alert notification templates that can be customized according to the user's needs. Venues and special events are constantly seeking a way to increase traffic to and at their events. Traditional approaches have included advertising and renting out meeting rooms at local hotels. Another approach, which is popular in Europe, is the use of event venues of all kinds. Venues, as a whole, generally charge for their use to promote their venue. They generally receive 10-25% of the gross revenue generated by an event, while the event organizers receive 70-90% of the gross revenue from the event. Early venues were monolithic and provided a single large stage to the public. While these venues have remained popular, there are some disadvantages to using them. One disadvantage is that an individual event needs to book the entire venue at once. Thus, a single large venue makes it difficult to split the event between more than two large venues. This problem becomes exacerbated when a user wants to break out their events into different specific venues, such as food, video and audio, showing, graphic and lighting, and seating. While a venue owner can continue hosting the event in different parts of their venue and split the charges and percentage of revenue on a piecemeal basis, this requires that individual users be familiar with the billing process. Further, a user must be familiar with the billing and accounting process in order to split up their event into different venues. These are common problems for those who organize events. Venue owners commonly do not want to deal with accounting. Venues commonly do not want to deal with the complexity of splitting a large event into different specific venues and billing for those venues. Additionally, venue owners and users are reluctant to use credit cards because most venues do not accept them. Furthermore, the use of credit cards is inconvenient. The venue has to collect the money using cash, collect a credit card for a one-time transaction, pay for the transaction, and then refund the credit card. Even if venue owners and users are comfortable with these processes, they are still reluctant to use credit cards. For venue owners and users, it can be a challenge to
