I'm trying to set up a Linux swap partition for the first time, and I'm running into trouble due to my lack of understanding about how Linux creates partitions. Here's the process I've been following: Create a partition for / and /boot in ext4 Create a partition for /usr in ext4 Create a partition for /home in ext4 Create a partition for swap in swap Currently, I'm trying to create the swap partition before starting the installation process. If I create the swap partition during the installation process, will it overwrite any partitions on which I've already created / or /usr? I would be happy with any advice on how to set up a swap partition for the purpose of using it as my OS's swap partition. A: You can create the swap partition before installation. When the installation is finished you will find your swap partition. If you create a swap file and want to use it as swap partition, you should increase its size first. Q: Is the verb that means you can "control" something "govern"? I know you can "govern" something that it is possible to control.
