Want to see a new side of my code? Head over to github. I will be answering questions here and in the comments, and I'll post my. But what if we could keep our codebase in sync as the. source code rather than just the most recent version? A: Pentaho Data Integration is a business intelligence tool for connecting to databases and viewing their data in various visual formats. It supports being deployed on Linux, Windows and Mac, and it's open source. A: Coda (1.0) is a "code + folder" web app, which means you can edit your code with a web interface. Coda allows you to see and edit code in two ways. First, code is displayed as you type it into your text editor. Second, code is displayed in a graphical window (a.k.a. visual display) and the graphical representation allows you to see changes to what you wrote. You can toggle between viewing your code in your text editor and viewing your code in your visual display. Coda is free for non-commercial use. While it's not open-source, you are free to download a copy and use it on your own server. A: FlatFile Abstractions: A storage abstraction library to define and manage a flatfile database (TXT, CSV). It provides a common programming model, so that applications can be easier, faster, and cleaner to use. FlatFile Abstractions is a set of utilities that allow. The FlatFile Abstractions package has a C# implementation. FlatFile Abstractions is designed to be easy to use, so you can easily. The library has a free 60 day trial. It is free for commercial use. FlatFile Abstractions is free to use for commercial, academic, and personal projects I find this library interesting for two reasons, one is that it presents a flat file database in a object oriented way. The other is that I think that big flat files are simply hard to query efficiently. This library, I guess, is a way to make it easier to write better SQL queries against those files. . It's just for a moment, but it is unmistakably powerful. When we look at the past year in terms of the human/animal relationship, it's easy to feel a mixture of sadness and joy at the progress that has
