Although there is a strong association between plasma cholesterol and triglyceride concentrations and the risk of developing coronary heart disease, plasma lipid concentrations may not be the only factor affecting the risk of disease. The effect of hepatic cholesterol synthesis on plasma lipid concentrations is poorly understood. Hepatic cholesterol synthesis is stimulated by biliary cholate, which in turn increases the expression and secretion of apolipoprotein (apo) B-48. The effect of liver loss of function, brought about by partial hepatectomy, on the expression and secretion of apoB-48 and the plasma concentrations of cholesterol and triglyceride was investigated. Rats were partially hepatectomized and plasma and liver cholesterol and triglyceride concentrations were measured 5, 7, 10 and 13 days later. Hepatic cholesterol content was reduced by approximately 50% at each of these time-points posthepatectomy. There was a marked increase in the expression of apoB-48 mRNA in the remnant liver during the first 10 days post-hepatectomy, indicating a rise in the rate of synthesis of apoB-48. The plasma concentrations of cholesterol and triglyceride fell sharply from pre-hepatectomy values and the rate of decrease was approximately 80% faster following hepatectomy. The expression of hepatic apoB-48 mRNA returned to pre-hepatectomy values after a delay of 7 days. This delay in the reversion of apoB-48
