(2) Description of the Prior Art Building a new house or home has always been a significant investment for a family. From the initial decisions about the lot, the surrounding neighbourhood, and the structural materials and finishing of the house itself, it is a project that can have far-reaching consequences for a new family. To begin with, the house design must be chosen carefully to meet the needs of the family, as well as the prospective owner's interests. For instance, the design must be based on safety standards for the intended use, dimensioned to make the house affordable for the buyer, and comply with the codes of the jurisdiction in which the house will be built, all of which affect the final cost of the house and the cost of its renovation. The house itself must also be built to a suitable, safe standard. That is, the walls must be strong enough to support the necessary loads to resist damage from such things as floods, earthquakes, and other natural forces. It is unclear which of the two men was a better policeman. At seven years of age, when pressed by an uncle, Joe DiMaggio told him: "I would not like to be a policeman because of the work and the hours.... I would rather be a movie star." He had already made two films; the best of them, "The Hucksters," was an important hit. But the uncle pressed him for a second choice: "Me, why me?" DiMaggio protested. "Why not you?"

The controlled electrolytic plating of various metals, including silver, copper and nickel, is an important and necessary process for a large number of industrial applications. In the case of copper, the plating process is typically performed by immersing the substrate into an electrolytic bath in which an electroless plating bath is dissolved. Electrical power is then applied to the substrate or cathode in the bath. The copper substrate is then rinsed and immersed into a second electroless plating bath in which a plating bath is dissolved. Electrical power is then applied to the substrate again and the thus-coated substrate is rinsed and immersed in a third electroless plating bath containing another electroless bath. This procedure can be repeated as many times as desired. The alternating current (AC) electrical power source is preferably the same throughout all the alternating current electrolytic baths used in this process. The copper that is deposited is then oxidized or otherwise removed from the substrate in a process known as the copper flashing process. The flashing process is performed by immersing the substrate into a hot, dilute acid solution. The flashing process is important for preventing adverse effects to the substrate, such as contamination and corrosion, caused by the electrolytic process. During the electroless plating process, the substrate is immersed in the electroless baths. Electroless baths are highly corrosive electrolytes that typically contain complex, metallic soaps as a catalytic reducing agent. The baths typically contain complex metallic soaps as a stabilizing and/or anti-oxidant.
