With an increasing number of examples of supramolecular assemblies assembled at interfacial surfaces, it is clear that organic functional material is able to realize its best performance through directional arrangement at solid/liquid interfaces. Here, the interfacial molecular self-assembly strategy for the fabrication of inorganic nanofibers by a simple interfacial assembly method has been successfully achieved. The organic nanofibers were generated by a nucleation-aggregation-growth mechanism in a heptamethine cyanine molecule. The cylindrical morphology with a length of about 0.25 μm is fully controlled by manipulating the interfacial driving forces such as temperature, pH value, and ionic strength. Moreover, the obtained nanofibers display enhanced thermal stability and high fluorescence quantum yield with the emission peaks from 550 to 800 nm. As a proof of concept for applications, we demonstrate the use of the

I have a form with two submit buttons: one to edit the submitted data, and one to store the data. The page works fine in Firefox, but when I use Internet Explorer, the page throws an error: The form contains trybuttons for action control. Please use them. I'm using them to save the submitted data, but I just don't want IE to use them. Is there a way to prevent Internet Explorer from trying to use them? I suspect I can work around this by putting an IF statement around the trybuttons, but I am curious if there is another, more elegant, way. Here is the code: beginTransaction(); $sql = "UPDATE Member SET name = $name, gender = $gender WHERE id = $id"; $conn->exec($sql); // commit $conn->commit(); $conn->close(); echo "New record created successfully"; } catch (Exception $e) {
