Chlorinated hydrocarbons, such as trichloroethylene (TCE), have been widely used as a solvent for various purposes. In the last decade, the focus in chemical process industries has shifted to the development of greener and eco-friendlier solvent. Chlorine-containing solvents such as TCE are being replaced by chlorine-free, low- or no-chlorine solvents, including aliphatic hydrocarbons, alkanes, carbon disulfide, and carbon tetrachloride. Although the replacement of TCE with such alternatives can be welcomed in the current environment, the emerging green solvent technology requires providing a better user-friendly solvent for the highly reactive species, especially for solvating or extracting chlorinated species can be extracted from TCE using an aqueous solution, the efficiency of such process is low. Meanwhile, the reactive molecule, trichloroacetic acid (TCAA), is generally generated by the reaction between TCE and a hydrogen chloride (HCl) gas. Hydrogen chloride gas can be generated by the reaction of hydrochloric acid. In aqueous solution, such as that containing sulfuric acid, a portion of the HCl can react with water to produce gaseous hydrochloric acid and hydrochloric a
