Type 1 diabetes mellitus is a genetic disease of immune function. A subset of the endocrine disorder is chronic hyperglycemia, which is a characteristic sign of the disease and can be successfully treated with exogenous insulin. The overall goal of this project is to understand the immune mechanisms that control diabetes in animal models, and then to apply our findings to develop treatment of human Type 1 diabetes mellitus. To understand the immunological control of Type 1 diabetes, we have developed an active immunization system in mice that closely mimics the autoimmune disease in humans. This model allows us to (1) manipulate the immune system while minimizing the contribution of endocrine autoimmunity,

(2) identify the lymphocyte responses that are required for pathogenesis, and (3) define the role of regulatory cells in the control of diabetes. We found that anti-islet autoimmunity occurs in about half the mice immunized, and that, for these mice, the autoimmune response proceeds by central deletion of antigen-specific T cells as well as by peripheral deletion of antigen-specific T cells. In addition, a subset of the mice does not develop diabetes, and provides a model for studying the pathogenesis of diabetes as well as for identifying the immune defects that lead to immune tolerance. Based on our findings, we hypothesize that peripheral deletion of antigen-specific T cells represents a physiological mechanism for maintaining self-tolerance and that an autoimmune response can emerge if the peripheral deletion is defective. In addition, we hypothesize that this disease is mediated by unique deletion

Video Studio 10.0.10.168. Creation of a virtual brain atlas using magnetic resonance imaging data: a general approach for the definition of the human brain atlases. The generation of atlases of the human brain is an important prerequisite for relating functional data to anatomical data. While an objective image analysis technique is the preferable method for generating a brain atlas, it has been shown that user-based approaches are feasible. The aim of the present study was the development of a computer-based brain atlas-making program called CebiBrain. The program
