What are some times I can do with bind? I know I use it to turn a list into a regular list, but are there any use cases for the monadic version? ($\gg=$) :: Monad m => m a -> (a -> m b) -> m b A: The most straightforward examples are functions that need an environment context to execute: foo :: String -> [Char] foo = print. head foo :: Int -> [Char] foo = print. head foo :: Ord b => [b] -> [Char] foo = print. head Notice the global context (print), while the kinds of the parameter are inferred. If the types can be inferred, it is most probably nicer to have a method than to use the bind function; if types are explicit, the bind is a good choice. One interesting application is to get a function in the correct monad and use that function to execute in the right environment: foo = do xs Identity [Char]
