Disposition of fentanyl in the mouse, rat, guinea pig, rabbit, dog, and man after a single intravenous dose. Data from humans and four species of laboratory animals after a single intravenous dose of fentanyl (0.5 mg/kg) were analyzed by visual comparison of the plots of logarithm (base 10) of the plasma concentration of drug versus time. The results indicated that fentanyl was completely metabolized in all species except dog. The half-life of fentanyl in the mouse was approximately 8 min, in the rat 12 min, in the guinea pig 2.4 h, in the rabbit 18 h, in the dog 0.4 h, and in man 1.0-1.5 h. The extent of fentanyl conversion to metabolites was similar in the mouse, rat, and guinea pig, the latter two species hydrolyzing about 85% of the drug. In the rabbit, dog, and man, substantially more fentanyl was hydrolyzed to metabolites. The major metabolic pathways of fentanyl were conjugation with glucuronic acid, followed by oxidation of the N-dealkylated side-chain, and dehydrogenation of the phenolic hydroxyl group. The three major metabolites were naloxone-beta-3-glucuronide, beta-phenylethyl-naloxone, and nalbuphine. Ivan Turgenev won the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1905. Anna Akhmatova in 1925 and Andrei Bely in 1926 were awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. Alexander Blok, Boris Pasternak, Vasily Grossman, Joseph Brodsky, Andrey Bely, Konstantin Paustovsky, Nikolai Gumilev, Lev Nardoush, and Yakov Polonsky were also awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. 1900s 1905 Ivan

I have been using SQL Server 2008 lately and keep on hearing that because there is no contention when exclusive locks are held on a table that the throughput will be higher. I could not for the life of me figure out why this is. Here is my logic: Suppose there is one process doing some long operation. The table has a clustered index. This one process locks the table to read the data. Now suppose another process is trying to lock the same table. In this situation, if there is contention, the second process will block and thus the first process will do whatever its doing and some rows will be added to the table. And the second process will be able to continue as the first process has done its work. But suppose the first process has locked the table (EXCLUSIVE) and not released it. Now the second process has to wait until the first process releases the lock. At this point, both processes are waiting on the same table, which is 0cc13bf012
