Armando Sanchez's argument in the Indiana Supreme Court has had an earful of being too much, too soon. The Indianapolis lawyer wants to reunite a kidnapped mother and her 8-year-old son. He argues he did not drive more than 35 miles a week and that he should be allowed to reunite the mother and boy. Indiana law bans these cases. In 2004, the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Texas law because it treated only "extreme cases involving child endangerment and parental abduction" differently from other crimes. The justices said federal law should dictate this kind of per-emptory statute, which they said wasn't needed to deter those offenses. But Justice David and Justice Sullivan say the law should get a hearing. While the justices didn't wind up striking down the law, Chief Justice Bob and Justice Massa still agreed that a hearing should be held. The chambers decided the state law was not an "appropriate fit" with a U.S. statute and would not be accepted. Sign up for weekly emails on the latest law, politics and more. "Our unanimous decision is to send the case back to the trial court to decide if it is unconstitutional," Justice Nickson wrote. "This decision reverses that in part and puts this question before the U.S. Supreme Court." The opinion came Thursday after a June 30 hearing in the Supreme Court in which Justice Tones Pauley asked questions about the federal law and the state law and other issues related to the case. As part of that hearing, justices reviewed the letter of Sanchez. This
