Conventional inflatable mattresses are formed of an inflatable cell which is draped over a foam backing. As used herein, the term "conventional inflatable mattress" encompasses all inflatable mattresses which are not of the "air cell" type. Although the term "air cell" is now largely obsolete in this art, and the term "conventional inflatable mattress" is preferred herein, it should be understood that "air cell" inflatable mattresses are those which are now most widely used. Such mattresses are of the type shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,630,916--Bauer. The disadvantages of using conventional inflatable mattresses may be summarized as follows: 1. Small air cells are difficult to inflate, and therefore it is often necessary to use the mattress by a person several times before the mattress is completely inflated. PA1 2. When providing a mattress for a person, it is common to provide the mattress with a weight support means in the form of a spring assembly. Such spring assembly is normally situated at the head end of the mattress. In order to expand the cell, it is necessary to completely inflate the cell and then to insert the spring assembly, followed by the insertion of padding therearound. In the event that the spring assembly is unevenly located, it is necessary to reposition
