So I've been keeping everyone guessing. But as of yesterday, the script is out and the movie is dead. And here is the "inside" scoop. Here's the deal. I'm a long time contributor to the Blogcritics site and one of their best authors. But in the past year or so, they've promoted their own Editor-in-Chief Jami O'Brien. And she's the real reason you haven't heard anything from me. Until yesterday. My contract has been officially ended by Blogcritics. And while I'm not exactly upset about it, I'm not thrilled about it, either. I've long felt that being published by Blogcritics is only a stepping stone to being published by someone else who values your writing. This has already happened. When Ed from the Danger Room stepped up and offered me a contract with his site, I leapt at it. But it never got past the development stage. So now I'm officially unemployed. At least for the time being. I'll keep this blog up. But for the time being, I'm going to finish this movie and hope someone will offer me a great big contract with them. But I'm so, so, so ready to get off this roller coaster ride. So now you can stop reading this and go straight to the announcement post. I will have a new home soon. And my new website will be launched very, very soon. A lot of people have asked me over the past couple of weeks: What is the movie about? And the answer is that it's about losing faith in the things that you've worked hard for and believing that things have passed you by. And that can happen to anyone of any age. It just depends on how you view your life. The core idea
