In most systems, the clock signal is produced by a clock generator circuit. The clock generator circuit in many cases consists of a resistor network and a plurality of digital signal processing integrated circuits. The purpose of the clock generator circuit is to provide a plurality of clock signals of different frequencies and phase relationships to different portions of the system. The clock signals are used as a multiplexed clock signal to synchronize the data processing system with a reference signal. A clock signal is an alternating current signal having a constant waveform and a constant frequency. An ideal clock signal has, for example, a sinusoidal waveform having a constant amplitude, and a constant frequency. A clock signal generally is generated by a clock generator circuit. In many cases, the clock generator circuit has a plurality of resistors which are connected in an xe2x80x9cR-Cxe2x80x9d voltage divider circuit. The R-C divider circuit provides a plurality of clock signals which are of different phases with respect to each other. For example, the phases of the clock signals can be 90xc2x0 or 180xc2x0 out of phase with respect to each other. The quality of the output clock signals of the clock generator circuit is usually measured by the voltage divider constant and the accuracy of the resistor values used to make the voltage divider. A major problem of these circuits is that the resistors are usually made of thin film resistors. Thin film resistors are resistors of small width and are generally of high accuracy. However, due to manufacturing processes and temperature changes, the accuracy and/or width of the thin film resistors is often adversely affected. One of the typical
