Story:

In 1954 America, the country was divided into two sides. For one decade, Cold War led the USA to develop nuclear weaponry. After the success of the AI, BPR, the USSR enters the peace treaty to the American government and the Cold War era will end with peace forever.

Cold War engages round-based survival gameplay which requires problem solving strategy and also power attacks to kill the adversary. To make your survival, you need to conquer the different worldwide states. The game features 30 different national themes with 9 Regions. In each new area, there are more than 100 of challenging custom-made bosses. The goal of a game is to get the maximum amount of XP in the given time in order to upgrade your character, armors, and health. You can enter various improvements every time.

Grab your victory weapons and match yourself against the deadliest custom-made creatures! It is bullet-hell, border line, rogue-like military strategy game in which you get fighting against both opposition including cannon, military weapons, light ballistic, dark gravitational bombs and fireballs. Try to fight with the powerful enemy bullets, sometimes you have just small chance to throw the bullets.

You can regenerate health by consuming certain items such as meat, blood, fruits, etc. Of course, you can use power up to get the attack power, fuel, and capacity/auto-repair, etc. When you run out of health, Game will be over.

Come back here again and again as there are a lot of items that can be collected during the gameplay.

There are many kinds of AI weapons. You can throw them if you want to survive. Die in the top of a boss tower, there are strong enemies there. It is an important item to have it to win the game.

At last, how to enter the Five ZONES to beat the world? Simple! Just break the strong guards, you can try to get the extra keys from them, then come to where the blocked door is and break it. As you can see, you need great skills to break those guards. Win the game and you will get the last key.

OR I have a confession to make: I am afraid of spiders. Which one is correct and why? A: I think both are grammatically correct. You don't have to use either 'or'. The verb and subject is there. The reason is, in the first example, you are only going to say that you are afraid of spiders. In the second example, you are actually saying you are afraid of being afraid of spiders. This means the base of active memory management is available. Each modern OS has its own set of core routines. The same is true of most PC operating systems. "If memory allocation is taken care of in the operating system, which is the case for Apple Mac OS X, it means the programmer doesn't need to worry about allocation and destruction of memory himself," explained Wolf. "In other words, the operating system takes care of memory allocation and destruction for you." Consequently, it means the programmer does not need to bother about issues such as cache coherency or effective memory usage. Wolf then refers to the architecture of a multithreaded programming environment. If only for the principle of teaching the proper way to build software, the quest for core system routines is good, although the implementation is often poor. "This is why, especially for C and C++ programmers, memory allocation and destruction has to be taken care of by the operating system. If not, they will suffer from leaks and the programs won't work." Wolf said that for Linux, a specification exists for the resource management of virtual memory, including core routines for memory allocation and deallocation. Linux also makes it easy for developers to write the code to handle such things themselves. Unfortunately, there are other Linux distributions that do not have an agreed upon specification or even a clear roadmap of what the organization wants to happen in the future. This leads to some unnecessary confusion and possible misunderstanding when programmers are trying to handle core routines themselves. "Programmers can use the Linux

This game began as a richly detailed and built game world meant to serve as a playground for designers to work with different ideas, mechanics, and moods. I published the first game a few years ago, and the experience and feedback gave me a deeper appreciation for the possibilities of what a game can be. This time around, I worked hard at developing the character, the story, and the mechanics of the game. After finishing the first game and continuing to evolve the game world, I realized it had become a story of survival and a science fiction tale which turned into something quite different than I originally set out to create. I have been lucky enough to playtest it and get lots of good feedback, which has helped me further refine the game. Novelty: The Studio is a challenging game with a no a level check needed. There are no dice rolls, but there are many calculations and calculations that are incorrect, misleading, and counter-intuitive. There are also more than a few action sequences, as well as a wide variety of puzzles that rely on how the player perceives and interprets the game world, the mechanics, and the story. So there's a lot for you to discover. It's a game that isn't just difficult, but also quite complex and there's plenty to explore if you're up for it. About the Game: You're a cat with a job. You were hired as a cat to keep an eye on the building, and maybe take the occasional field trip. What you don't know is what you've let yourself in for and the perils that lurk outside the walls of the world you live in. As a cat, your most effective defenses are stealth and the power of your feline senses. You navigate the world carefully, and learn how to hide the better. The time flies by, but you have all the tools to survive. Levels: The world of The Studio has three different levels, each with its own energy, mood, and play experience. Level 1 is indoors, and is a bit dark and a little spooky. Level 2 is outside, and is a bit lighter and more playful. Level 3 is a game world that is built upon and expands on the game world and the actual experience that live in game, combined with the story of a cat that's out on a job and getting into trouble.

The prognostic importance of plasma post-operative tissue factor levels in unselected patients with colon cancer. Histological assessment of venous invasion or T status is insufficient to reliably predict the prognosis of colon cancer patients after potentially curative surgery. Our aim was to evaluate the impact of a readily accessible and routinely measured surrogate marker of venous invasion on clinical outcomes. Plasma levels of tissue factor (TF) were measured by ELISA in unselected patients with Dukes' stage D colon cancer at the time of surgery before any treatment. For patients who received chemotherapy, TF levels were measured in the serum at 3 days after chemotherapy began. Forty-two consecutive patients were enrolled. In univariate Cox regression analysis, an elevated value of TF was associated with poor disease-free survival ($p = 0.003$). In multivariate analyses, an elevated TF was independently predictive of poor disease-free survival ($p = 0.036$) with each 1 ng/mL increase in TF level conferring a 30 % increase of the relative risk of disease recurrence (95 % CI 0.005-0.94). The elevation of plasma TF levels were strongly associated with poor prognosis of colon cancer. Thus, TF may be potentially applicable for the prediction and early detection of high-risk patients with colon cancer after surgery.
