The Royal College of Physicians has published guidelines for organ donation, but these focus on the healthcare professional's role within the family as a donor advocate, and do not provide guidance on the medical care of the donor before death. Aim === To examine current NHS Trust organ donation strategies in the north-east of England, and to use the findings to inform development of best practice guidelines for the medical care of potential organ donors prior to death. Method ===== We conducted a review of strategies for organ donation in NHS trusts in the north-east of England, and conducted a detailed review of available evidence on organ donation, and on deaths that led to organ donation. Results ===== There is a wide variation in strategies for organ donation across trusts. Donor policies fall into one of four categories; it depends on whether there is active consent for organ donation and whether there is any way of locating the living relatives. A small number of trusts have detailed uniform processes including bereavement counselling. There is a lack of current evidence on medical care of potential organ donors, and on deaths that led to organ donation. It is therefore not clear whether care is in accordance with the available evidence.
