Psychosomally stressful physical conditions are known to activate ectopic adenosine release in the skin. We tested the hypothesis that atopic dermatitis (AD) is associated with a psychosomatically triggered endogenous adenosine release, which in turn leads to altered skin structures. To compare purinoceptor distribution in the epidermis of AD patients and healthy controls. Specifically, we investigated effects of psychosomatic stress (i.e., hot-water immersion) on dermal and epidermal adenosine levels. Studies were performed on biopsies of normal-looking skin. Purinergic receptors were labelled by use of a non-radioactive indocyanine green-conjugated (ICG) antagonist of P2 purinoceptors. Acute psychosomatic stress raised endogenous adenosine levels in the epidermis of healthy volunteers. In AD patients, acetylcholine receptor distribution was altered in comparison with healthy controls. In AD patients, epidermal cholinergic receptors were present in higher numbers, and P1 purinoceptor expression was reduced and P2 purinoceptor expression was increased compared with healthy controls. The increased epidermal cholinergic receptor expression was not significantly altered by psychosomatic stress. Acute psychos e79caf774b
