Git and Darcs are the two most popular DVCS. Darcs use a darcs-style patch queue with version-based identifiers. I'm trying to use git-annex in my local git repository to work with a big repository via git@github.com:./ some_dir. The git annex directory is not supposed to be a versioned repository. It is supposed to be a tool that reads the blobs from a versioned repository. When I created my annex directory, I added git-annex to the pre-commit script. This means that every time I add new file to my repository, the annex file is created and modified, too. The problem is that Darcs store versions of the patches in a versioned and append-only repository. In git, all the files in git-annex are considered to be files and not versions of patches. This means that I'm not able to rebase and not able to commit the files to the same versioned repository. Is there a way to configure git-annex to read the blob from the versioned repository and then add them into my git-annex local repository? A: git annex only knows about blobs, and not about versions. That is, it wants a blob for each file, and it wants to add that blob to the index. So you have two options: Run a local git-annex server. Git annex doesn't have a web interface, but you can start a git daemon that will run git annex, and then connect to it with git annex readwrite. Tell git annex to write all patches to a blob with the --write-blob option, and then not add them to the index
