Allstar/Cinetext/Legendary In a literary sense, the problem is two-fold. First, the stories we look back on tend to become dated, better or worse, depending on our own tastes.

Second, the world of film is notoriously unstable. Coppola's The Godfather (1972) pushed the art form to new levels with an epic scope, and perhaps the pinnacle was the 2001 remake, in which the way actors were edited into the action was so naturalistic that the characters' emotional states were easy to identify. This was also the year the idea of a CGI giant spider (as opposed to a costumed one) attacked a bank and planted a virus into the minds of the global population, and it was only in the second half of the decade that the dangers seemed to recede back into the past. In 2010, though, the book that came to be known as The Girl with the Dragon Tattoo was published. It's a modern-day crime fiction masterpiece, the film was fairly well received (if you're interested in seeing the world of high-impact crime dramas differently, there's the Scandinavian The Killing), and while we're unlikely to witness a remake in the present day, we may see that genre flourish in our time.

The movie with which I'm most familiar, though, is The Basketball Diaries. Francis Ford Coppola is no doubt the most acclaimed director in the 1970s, but for my money it's this Coppola-isation of a childhood story that works best, the way it has, on a small scale and with a cast who were all just kids when they made it. But before that, there was The Rainmaker 0cc13bf012
