While the Trump administration continues to fight against the Affordable Care Act, a federal judge struck down an Arizona law that would have enabled the state to continue refusing to expand Medicaid under the law. The decision from Judge David Campbell of the US District Court for Arizona is a victory for the 30 million Americans who would be eligible for health care through Medicaid expansion under the law. Among those that would benefit are more than 720,000 Arizona residents. The US government was one of many parties to file an appeal of the state's lawsuit against the ACA. That case has been tied up by the US Supreme Court, which has twice heard arguments about whether the individual mandate is constitutional, but not yet delivered a definitive ruling on the topic. "The healthcare system in Arizona has been replete with problems for many years," Campbell wrote. "The reported inability or refusal of Arizona health care providers to take seriously their obligation to provide medical services to the Arizona residents ... has often led to the denial of medical services to the very citizens most in need." For now, according to the New York Times, Arizona's Republican-led Legislature will not allow the state to take advantage of the Medicaid expansion under the ACA. But that decision does not mean that residents in the state will have to remain uninsured. In 2012, Arizona opted not to participate in the health care exchange as part of Obamacare. So while the ACA won't help the residents of Arizona with health care, it's not as if they're barred from getting any health care, the Times points out. The paper reports that the Republican leadership in the state is weighing other options in this election season to undo the Medicaid expansion: The demise of the Arizona plan gives the new Trump administration greater leverage in such a future fight, but it also likely creates challenges for the Republican
