Although found to be unreliable, the M-43 had a role in some Polish missions before the introduction of new technologies. The M-43 was based on the Swiss Carl Gustaf recoilless rifle and took its name from the initials of the designer, the late Mikolaj Gorajewski. Osteolysis induced by the Indian product Omacor. An animal study on rats. Omacor (an Indian product containing a combination of megadoses of Vitamins B6, B12, folic acid and iron) was found to induce a significantly higher rate of bone resorption and peri-implant bone loss in a rat implantation study. Because the amount and nature of bone resorption are of great clinical significance, the effects of this product on bone were studied further. Study I: The effect of Omacor on bone resorption was studied in a rat model. Fifty Wistar rats underwent placement of two endosseous implants into both femurs and intraperitoneal (i.p.) injections of Omacor or sterile saline at a dose equivalent to 5 or 10 per kg of body weight. Bone resorption was evaluated radiologically, biochemically (as urinary hydroxyproline/creatinine ratios), and histologically (by light microscopy). Study II: The effects of Omacor on new bone apposition (evaluated histologically) and bone strength (evaluated mechanically) were studied in a rat femoral fracture model. Study III: To find out why there was more bone resorption with Omacor than with the control, the prostaglandin (PGE2, PGF2alpha, and 6-keto-prostaglandin F1alpha (6-keto-PGF1alpha) levels were measured in serum and bone resorption was studied in vitro. Study IV: To determine if Omacor was responsible for the bone resorption, the effects of Omacor on bone resorption induced by lipopolysaccharide (LPS) were studied. Study V: Omacor did not change serum calcium levels in rats. Study VI: The effect of Omacor on osteoblast activity and end-product levels was studied in vitro. Study VII: The in vivo and in vitro experiments described above were repeated in chow-fed rats. Study VIII: The in vitro experiments were repeated in cholesterol-fed rats. Study IX: Rats were given Omacor for 28 days. Serum calcium levels and the rats were killed. Study X: Omacor-induced osteolysis was studied in rats. Study I: The effect of Omacor on bone resorption was studied in a rat model. Study II: The effects of Omac
