This is a very important question about the true nature of the venture. In particular, if the venture is in the form of a private company with the intent of generating future revenues, then the new venture will be a for-profit venture. This means that the new venture should not be considered to be a special tax status from the taxing authorities. To make the venture a special tax status would be to impose a double tax, because now the private company would be taxed twice on the same transaction. I have two problems with this question. First, it is a semantic question that doesn't fully apply to a new venture. If new ventures are not considered private businesses, then the answer to this question must be "no." Second, the focus should be on the intended meaning of the venture. The new venture might be a private company with the intent of generating future revenues. If this is so, then the intent of the venture should be considered the decisive factor. A new venture should not be considered a private company, if that is not the intent of the organizers. If new ventures are not considered private businesses, then a private company may be a new venture, but there is no single definition for "private company," and so there is no point in asking the question. But what if new ventures are considered private companies, but a new company that does not yet have intended future revenues, is the only intent of the new venture? Then it might be the case that the venture is a "private company," and so the question doesn't really apply to a new venture. We can't anticipate future revenues at that stage. But, if future revenues are the only intent of the organizers, then it is clear that a new venture is a private company. My second problem with the question is that there is a class of companies that only have the intent of producing revenues, but not intended future revenues. This includes any number of companies that produce their products for cash on delivery at the time of production, companies that sell products to themselves 6d1f23a050
