This text may be provided by transcript, translation, or both. With a few small exceptions, every country is moving in a more and more nationalistic direction, my fellow nations, and that seems to me a very bad thing. The best outcome for the world in the long term is that we remain an assembly of loosely connected polities with a largely shared economy. It's a situation that most of us are used to, and it's not unusual in the history of the world. The temporary exceptions are Germany and Italy in the 1920s and China in the 1980s, and in each case the phenomenon was misunderstood, generating a crisis of faith that is now either past or has yet to begin. Here are the data. The World Values Survey is the most ambitious and informative survey of human values ever conducted. This data isn't perfect, and there is a lot of missing information, but I think it's the best we are going to get. Since 2006, it has been collecting data on more than 150 countries in the world. So I decided to play the game: I took all the countries for which data is available and ranked them in their level of nationalism. The four largest nationalist groups in the world are China, India, Russia, and the United States. But the United States isn't unique, at least not in the sense of being the only major national power to have a majority of its population identify as nationalist. South Korea comes in fifth in the world, Norway is seventh, and Japan is tenth. What's remarkable about all of these countries is that none of them are particularly nationalistic. They are all much more closely linked with the United States than that. They all have citizens that are patriotic in the sense of being proud of where they are from, or used to be from. That's not to say that they're not nationalistic -- the Chinese I know are very nationalistic, and the Chinese that I meet are much more nationalistic than the Chinese I meet in the West. But all of these countries share a set of strong cultural values that transcend national boundaries. The
