I am developing an application that would allow users to manipulate data. The application would be embed inside a browser and thus be accessible across the Internet. Using security principals, the application would be able to request data only from the users that belongs to that principal. Unfortunately, users may not always follow the instructions to register their principal with the system, and I don't have the luxury to allow users to go to a page where they could edit their security information. The only way I can think of would be to ask the users to register with a local application that would create a security principal for them and add them to the current principal when it is created. The problem here is that I can't control when the user would register and create the principal, so I'm looking for a way to check if a user is already registered and existing principal has not been created in the meantime. Then, if the new principal can be created, add it to the current one and then proceed. The question is, what would be the best way to programmatically add a user to a different principal, is there a standard? I've found no information on the Internet regarding this. A: In general, there is no reason why you cannot add the new user principal to the current one, unless you specifically do not want the new user principal be a member of the current principal's group. The key part of the code you need to execute would be something like this (I am not adding error handling just for the sake of simplicity): PrincipalContext newUser = new PrincipalContext(ContextType.Domain, "domain.local", "user@domain.local", ContextOptions.SimpleBind, "user@domain.local"); UserPrincipal newUserPrincipal = new 6d1f23a050
