During the course of pregnancy, more stress of pregnancy is expected to be perceived by patients. Women may have adapted their birth culture, the participation of family members and the hospital environment more during pregnancy. Women may have expected to have an easy childbirth and be able to express their feelings of childbirth, and they may have pushed and pushed themselves during the second and third trimesters of pregnancy with similar demands to CAMs. In this study, pregnant women had few ideas regarding CAM use during pregnancy. However, we found that pregnant women who underwent DNR information about CAM during pregnancy had more positive attitudes toward CAM use during pregnancy than women without DNR information. Pregnancy is a period of rapid health changes and mental stress that makes it easy to have preconceived ideas and misconceptions in psychological and physiological changes. Therefore, pregnant women who undergo DNR information about CAM during pregnancy are more likely to have a positive attitude toward CAM use during pregnancy. This suggests that DNR information about CAM during pregnancy is needed to reinforce women's understanding of CAM during pregnancy. Perceived benefits of CAMs for pregnant women {#sec2-5} ----- The perceived benefits for the use of CAMs for pregnant women were adequate care during pregnancy and delivery and pregnancy-related symptoms. These items were similar to the perceived benefits of the use of CAMs reported in previous studies of pregnant women. Our findings, in conjunction with the findings of previous studies, suggest that women are likely to use CAMs for general illness treatment as well as to relieve and/or treat pregnancy-related symptoms. Perceived disadvantages of CAMs for pregnant women {#sec2-6} ----- The main reported disadvantages of CAMs were "side effects of CAMs", "CAMs are not effective", and "CAMs are dangerous." In addition, women have reported that they have not heard of the benefits of CAMs for pregnant women, indicating the need for more knowledge and information on the benefits of CAMs for pregnant women. Perceived barriers to CAM use during pregnancy {#sec2-7} ----- 6d1f23a050
