1. Field of the Invention
The present invention relates generally to the field of computer networking. More specifically, the present invention relates to a system for a host computer to dynamically allocate processor time to a network processor.
2. Description of the Related Art
Computer networks enable communications between networked computers and permit messages to be shared and distributed across the network. In some networks, networked computers transfer data to and from a computer that serves as a server. In these cases, the computer that serves as the server commonly has the capability of transferring data to multiple networked computers. As a result, the server typically contains program instructions and data that can be accessed by the multiple networked computers. This program instruction and data can be organized into one or more files.

In one type of network, many networked computers are connected to a host computer that includes one or more network interfaces and one or more processors. The host computer directs the operation of the networked computers, and transfers messages between the networked computers and the host computer. The host computer may use various packet-switching techniques to transfer data, including routing information. A network interface card receives the data from external networks and transfers the data to the host computer.
