This article describes the evolution of a problem-based simulation (PBS) designed to teach and assess key concepts in emergency medicine (EM) to students preparing for emergency medical services (EMS) career work. We compare two curricula to better understand the strengths and weaknesses of each program, and to make curricular choices based on those strengths. The curriculum design phase occurred when the Arkansas Department of Health incorporated a new EM curriculum. Part of this process was an evaluation of the change in the EM curriculum and to understand the effect of the change on the student population. Additionally, the curriculum design process included a review of existing EMS-related curricula and a look at Telemedicine in EM. The evaluation survey was used to determine if students were satisfied with both the new curriculum and the telemedicine component. Of the 364 EM students, 280 responded (80% response rate). Ninety-six percent of the respondents agreed/strongly agreed that the topics taught in the new curriculum were both important and effective in helping them prepare for an EMS career. Some 94.7% of the respondents agreed/strongly agreed that the combination of the new curriculum and telemedicine in EM was effective. The findings suggest that the new curriculum and the telemedicine component were well-received by students. The process used in this study allowed us to make curricular changes based on students' priorities, and at the same time, we continued to develop the new curriculum. The survey process helped us understand the strengths and weaknesses of our new curriculum and telemedicine. This, in turn, was used to make curricular changes to enhance our new curriculum.Q: How 6d1f23a050
